

How Without Going Satwik You Can Still Eat Healthy and Tasty Food - Aug 18

I don't strictly follow a satwik diet, but I've found ways to eat healthily without sacrificing taste. My father, enjoys dosas, parathas, and occasional sweets. My children, Aarav and Kavya enjoy it too. We have replaced deep fried snacks with air fried versions, used whole grains instead of refined flours, and added vegetables creatively to traditional recipes.

I don't strictly follow a satwik diet, but I've found ways to eat healthily without sacrificing taste. My father, enjoys dosas, parathas, and occasional sweets. My children, Aarav and Kavya enjoy it too. We have replaced deep fried snacks with air fried versions, used whole grains instead of refined flours, and added vegetables creatively to traditional recipes.

We've experimented with dishes like spinach and corn pancakes, vegetable pulao with minimal oil, and jaggery sweetened desserts. My children love to help, and it's become a fun, cross generational activity. Preparing food together teaches them balance and portion control.

I've realized that healthy eating doesn't have to mean restriction. Instead, it's about making smarter choices while keeping food flavorful. Sharing this journey with family has brought excitement to the kitchen and made healthy meals enjoyable for everyone.

Food is no longer just sustenance; it's a way to bond, learn, and celebrate flavors, all while taking care of health. Eating well is a lifestyle, not a limitation.
